

Stone Age to Cold War: Visitors to Historic Britain

Britain is a country with a rich and varied history, and its historic sites are a testament to the many different people who have visited and settled here over the centuries. From the Stone Age to the Cold War, visitors have come to Britain for a variety of reasons, including trade, conquest, and tourism. Their presence has had a profound impact on the sites they have visited and on British culture as a whole.

Stone Age

The first visitors to Britain arrived during the Stone Age, around 10,000 years ago. These people were hunter-gatherers who lived in small groups and relied on the land for their survival. They left behind a number of artifacts, including stone tools and weapons, which have been found at sites all over the country.
